Aging is a topic that touches all of us in many different ways. At the societal level, the "graying" of the population raises important questions about health care, workforce participation, social policy, and many more.

At the individual level, aging is a phenomenon that is multifaceted and is experienced in different ways by different people. For example, although one 65-year-old may have the physical fitness and the motivation to climb the highest mountains in Colorado, another 65-year-old may have impairments that limit his or her quality of life in profound ways. It is this great diversity of the aging process that the faculty and students who are involved with the Center on Aging work to address.

The Center is directed by internationally-known expert, Dr. Manfred Diehl, who has devoted his career to research and outreach on healthy aging.
